Dead Ringer. The monument suffered further from the weather and drainage problems, which caused the earth core inside the temple to expand, pushing the stone structure and tilting the walls. The problem intensifies in the case of nuclear power stations, where the removal of visibility affects, leaving aside for the moment the socio-political and economic structures of energy production, not just the level of electronic control systems, but also the actual process of nuclear fission itself, the "heart" of the facility, to use, if I may, an organic metaphor. I also have fond memories of rappelling off the climbing tower outside the fence as well as off a bridge that crossed a gully. I love what it is supposed to teach us.
